

Brian grew up playing sports and shared that his dad never missed one game. His dad would often have to swap shifts with others at the plant to get off work to attend his son's games. He remembers as a college quarterback looking into the stands to see his parents. He talks about what this meant to him every Saturday. Now, 59 years old, Brian still craves the approval of his dad and says that it's something men never outgrow. Brian went on to become a successful high school football coach, committed husband, and father of four. The theme of this interview was the fact that being a father is not complicated. It is a matter of commitment and consistency. One of the notable thoughts we took away from the interview was the importance of recognizing "the significance of the insignificant." Brian talks about how the little things we do as fathers, things that may seem insignificant, are often the things that matter most to our kids. Brian is now the Director of the Fellowship Of Christian Athletes in Etowah County and spends his time mentoring coaches and athletes.
