

David has always been a gifted athlete and tells about the time his dad bought a video camera when he was a child, just so he could film his son's games and show his friends. When Scott asked him why he worked so hard in life and sports David replied, "I just wanted my dad to be proud." During his senior year of high school, David found out that he was going to be a father. What he did shocked everyone. He immediately quit the basketball team and went out and got a job. Then, as an 18-year-old, he made a commitment that his child would never be without clothing, food, shelter, or emotional support - a commitment that he continues to keep nearly 3 decades later for all four of his kids. At the end of the interview, in a full-circle moment, his four children each thanked him for always being there for them and for making sure that their every need was met.
